Abstract. This paper argues that the primary drivers of innovation for micro enterprises in clusters are human factors sharpened through business processes (including learning by seeing and learning by doing), market sources (backward, forward and horizontal linkages) and market sophistication (size of the firm and nature of the buyer), in that order.

Factors Determining Innovation in Micro Enterprise Clusters
Therefore, clusters and networks have essential role in generating SMEs competitiveness in global markets (Audretsch, 2003). Main input to improve the enabling environment for developing competitiveness, that is a requirement for globalization, are clusters and networks because they create a conducive economic climate for SMEs.
